1 Both texts aim to present Jamie Oliver and his opinions. Text A is a behind the scenes interview where he is speaking about his new tour and how he feels about his new success as the 'Naked Chef'. On the other hand, Text B is a recipe from his book where he is discussing how to make a prawn and parsley fritata. In both, he ~~also~~ is presented as carefree and down to earth, however in Text A, this comes across greater compared to Text B.

Both texts present an element to Oliver's personality. For example, in Text A the syntactical parallelism "bit mad bit crazy, ~~and~~ but predominantly" presents Jamie Oliver as ~~the~~ humble and down to earth. This syntactical parallelism is also repeated "I never ever thought" which conveys the fact he is ~~not~~ arrogant. This presents him in a positive light to his fans which is most likely to be his audience as this DVD had to be purchased. The lexical group of feelings and emotion "mad", "I can", "surprised" and "nervous" shows Jamie Oliver to be the normal man who was lucky to get this

	opportunity. It presents him on an equal level with the viewers which creates the rapport with them, also strengthening his brand. Similarly, in text B, we there is a lexical group of emotions "honest," and "fussy" which still keeps up with the persona of Oliver being down to earth. However, another element of his personality is shown where he is less nervous and more professional than in text A. Text A contained fillers "er" and neologisms such as "pantomimey" to show how spontaneous the interview is as well ^{as} pre-planned spoken. However, in text B it is less spontaneous and professional. For example, the cooking jargon "zest", "anticipates" which presents him as a chef and the how passionate he is about cooking. He is presented as less as nervous in text B because this is his for passion and profession - this is what he knows best. Text A presents his personality to promote his brand in order for viewers to buy his cooking cookbooks and invest in him. It has a persuasive element in terms of marketing. Both texts also use humour, however, this is more present in text A. For example, "conceived at the right time probably" which adds to the fact of wanting to come across natural and normal to the

		audience. that's the main phrase any since it is a behind the scenes interview it also shows Jamie Oliver 'stripped' down with no barriers being held up. He is presented as open and free, a fresh new side to cooking trying to appeal to to a new modern society of the UK and perhaps even worldwide as he has been to many tours for his cooking profession. further similarly, text B uses humor such as the idiom "hit the nail on the head" which emphasises the fact that this dish is something readers should consider making. The idiom also maintains his natural and 'down to earth' personality, seen in the text A. However, text B is also more informative compared to text A. For example, the imperative verbs "preheat", "sprinkle" and "add" to instruct the how to make the recipe. Most of the imperatives are also relatively simple to ensure the cooking process is not difficult. This is because he believes "everyone should be able to cook" which is mentioned in text A. He aims to make cooking more easier and perhaps accessible to everyone, especially the working class perhaps, as he did grow up working class himself. However, ~~but~~ it is also quite informative too. For example "proper nouns of places" "Hammersmith Apollo" and "Birmingham" and also background information about the show. This gives an insight into how Jamie Oliver ~~but~~ had become Jamie Oliver and perhaps it also shows that celebrities are not all whirlwind characters. He is presented as an ordinary individual that was "very lucky". - it is almost showing him to be endearing.

Both tracks also aim to challenge the stereotype of cooking being ~~for~~ traditionally a woman's job. For example, In track A the dynamic verbs ~~as~~ "peeling" and "stirring" are related to cooking instructions and it presents the fact that Oliver is breaking away from the stereotype of a man not cooking at home. He the pirates "cooking's the new rock ~~and~~ roll" "rock'n roll" and it shows that cooking is essentially the coming trendy now. ~~On the other hand~~, it could be argued he is companying it to rock'n'roll because that music genre is associated with 'hard working' men. Since he is the first & well known working class male chef ~~to~~ male chef, he is breaking a barrier. This is essential for his brand because it is a new and fresh idea, attractive to the masses as it is different. He shows that not only women should cook, almost challenging and dispelling the stereotype which is also seen in ^{both} B. For example, the hyperbolic adjectives "incredible", "spectacular" promotes the recipe and it shows how ~~men~~ men can do cooking too and actually enjoy it. It is clear that Oliver aims to express that he is almost adding to the ~~more~~ equality in the world being a ~~trendsetter~~ but he remains humble about it which is why he is ~~so~~ well liked in the industry.

To conclude, both texts aim to present the personality of Jamie Oliver who ~~is~~ is shown as the 'naked chef'. He is shown in both texts to be humble, down to earth and essentially an ~~ordinary~~ ordinary man like the one we ~~are~~ rest of us feels. This creates popularity and they associate him with a positive image. He also acts to challenge stereotypes around certain traits which we sell on both sides. Being open and honest allows us to relate and accept him.
